Blood, sweat, jeers

Students and labor rights organizers, above, hold a protest in front of the State University of New York headquarters in downtown Albany at the corner of State Street and Broadway on Friday. The groups are upset that most of SUNY's 64 campuses across the state may be selling apparel made in foreign sweatshops. University at Albany graduate student Abraham Hmiel, below, joins others in the rally. To date, only four SUNY schools have joined what's known as the Worker Rights Consortium, an independent labor rights monitoring group. The SUNY board of trustees has issued statements against the practice.
